Rachmaninoff opened his program with a Liszt Ballade that told a story of surf-beaten rocks, with stunning passages for the left hand and typical Liszt structure.

He followed this with a Grieg Ballade, which repeated a somber bit of folk-lore through variation after variation. Then followed a group of four Chopin numbers, the first of these also a Ballade, with all the romantic beauty of Chopin, so the three styles came side by side, and there was opportunity to compare.

It seemed as if Rachmaninoff played with deeper shading than usual, his pianissimos were softer, his fortissimos more gradually approached, and yet every note stood out as if etched. One of the finest exhibitions of his unfaltering technique in passages where one hand accompanies the other. His Chopin is always most sympathetic, and the four numbers were beautifully played, especially the Scherzo, which is moody, passionate, querulous, at times like a Ballade, then develops a romantic beauty before it goes back to the original moodiness. Rachmaninoff played a well-known Chopin Valse.

The Etude Tableaux, played here for the first time, is one of his own compositions, a work of beauty, romance, mystery and sadness; his Polka de W. R. whimsical and charmingly artistic. The Dohnanyi Etude demands a tremendous technique, it is Russian and modern. Rachmaninoff's arrangement of Kreisler's Liebestraube is clever, musical, and a bit reminiscent of Chopin, destined to be popular with amateurs, we think. The Liszt Tarantella was played with fine technique—Liszt has come again into favor, with concert virtuosity—is it because only finished artists are able to play him?

The audience which had shown its appreciation throughout the program, refused to leave until Rachmaninoff played a last encore—his own first Prelude.
